That is when they often book with the airlines, at a walk-up price, on the day of travel, which WILL be about as expensive, as it gets. If they only stole your initial payments (did you pay by credit card, and if so, then you "might" get something back, but I doubt it), count yourself fortunate, and book with the airlines, chalking losses up to experience.

Of all the booking "ploys" it's probably the most difficult for the airline to prove your intent, as you could argue that you genuinely missed the flight, and knowing you were a no-show and your ticket canceled, decided to cut your losses and make your way back home via another route. However, that doesn't mean you're immune from action.
